WEATHER

WEATHER SYNOPSIS BY REGION:

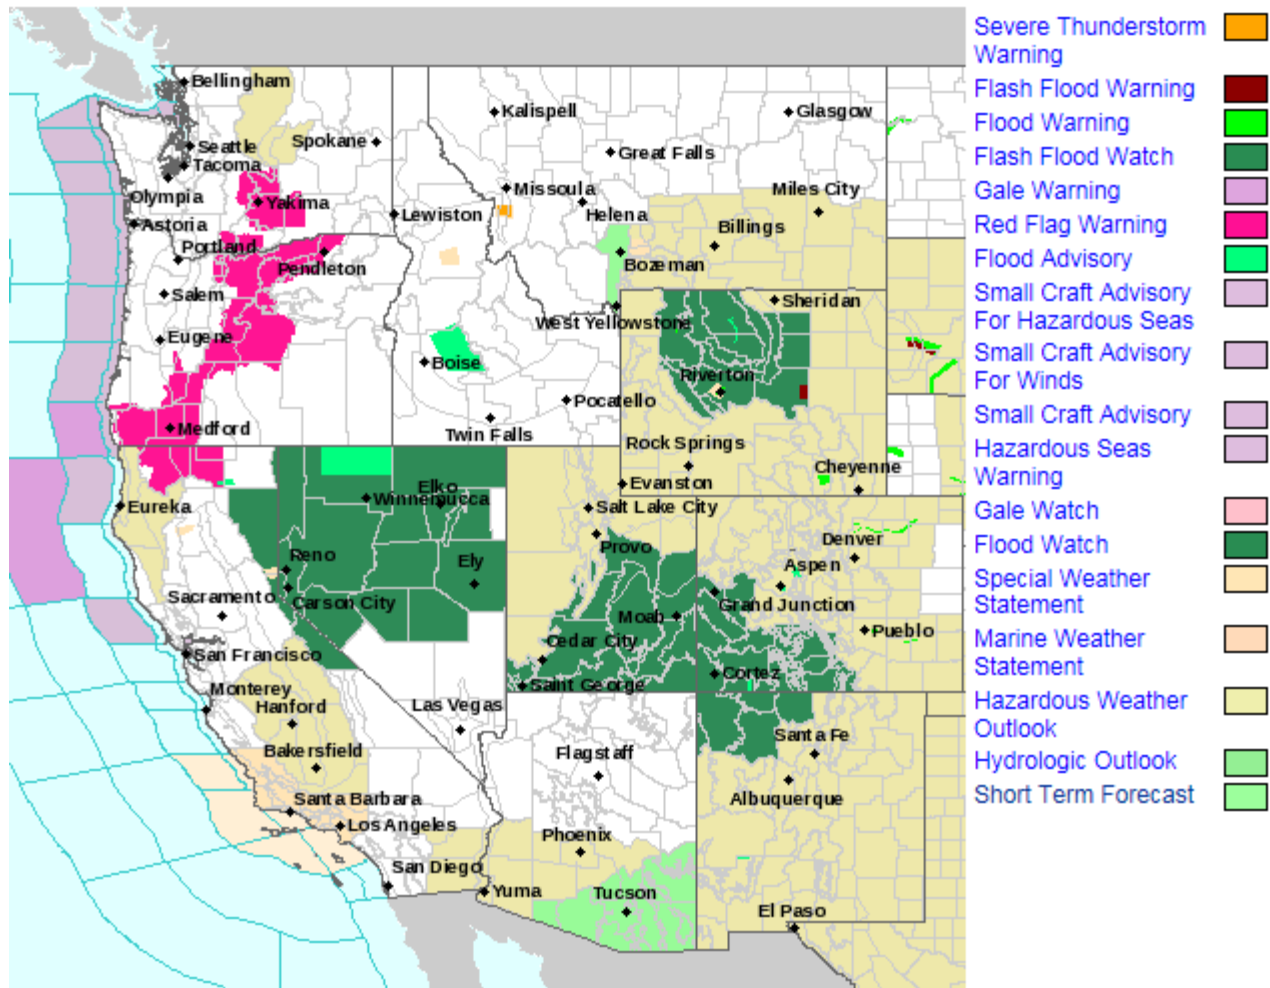

Northern Region

Low pressure offshore is pulling moist unstable air northward over California. Thunderstorms with light rainfall produced over 500 lightning strikes in far Northern California overnight and late yesterday. Showers and thunderstorms are expected over much of the Northern Operations region later today and Wednesday as moisture from former Hurricane Blanca gets drawn into the unstable air mass. Showers and thunderstorms will end by late Wednesday. Total rainfall will be 0.25-0.75 inches in the mountains and a trace to 0.25 inches elsewhere. The North Coast Predictive Service Area, which received lightning overnight, may only see scattered light rainfall amounts. High pressure will build over the region Thursday and Friday and bring drier and much warmer than normal temperatures back to Northern California through Saturday. Light to locally moderate north-northeast offshore surface winds will enhance these conditions from the lower Western Sierra slopes to the coast. A mostly dry low pressure trough will bring some cooling with onshore flow to coastal regions and moderate south-southwest winds to higher terrain beginning Sunday.

Southern Region

Moisture associated with former hurricane Blanca will lead to numerous light showers and a few thunderstorms today. Early this morning, two main areas of thunderstorms are occurring; one area is off the Central Coast while the other area remains over Northern Baja California. This first area is expected to remain offshore, but it may drift close enough to land and lead to isolated thunderstorms near Point Conception by late morning. The rest of the area will see overcast skies and scattered light showers. The air mass over the area is very moisture laden, but the extensive cloud cover over the area will inhibit convection to a large degree. But some isolated thunderstorms will be possible near the higher terrain, especially across the Sierras this afternoon. Rainfall amounts will be light, but a few spots may see some brief heavy rain from the stronger storms. Temperatures will be a few degrees cooler today due to the cloud cover, but the mountains will see highs in the 80s with 90s common in the valleys. The storms may linger well into the overnight hours. Wednesday, most of the moisture over Southern California will depart the region, but a weak area of cyclonic circulation may lead to widespread wet thunderstorms over the Sierras and the Inyo National Forest Wednesday afternoon. One or two thunderstorms may occur across the mountains of Southern California Wednesday afternoon. Surface flow will transition back onshore Wednesday through Friday and temperatures should return to near normal readings by Thursday. The Sierras will continue to see daily afternoon and evening thunderstorms Thursday and Friday, but they should be far fewer in number. This weekend, weak high pressure will send temperatures back to above normal readings. Temperatures will reach the upper 80s to lower 90s in the valleys with the San Joaquin Valley getting close to 100 once again. No thunderstorms are expected this weekend.
